History of 116 Pall Mall

John Nash, the famous and fashionable 19th century architect, designed 116 Pall Mall in the early 1820s.

Its imposing Regency exterior is typical of Nash's distinct style which is visible in many other buildings in the vicinity including those on Regent Street and nearby Carlton House Terrace. Nash also famously designed the Brighton Pavillion, Marble Arch and many more of London's most popular attractions.

116 is built on the site of Carlton House, the one-time London residence of the Prince of Wales prior to his accession to the throne as George IV in 1820. Carlton House was subsequently demolished when the King moved his household to the newly renovated Buckingham Palace.

The site, in the heart of London's genteel and fashionable "clubland", was then chosen as appropriate for the United Service Club. Building work took two years and was completed in 1828, £7,000 over budget and at a total bill of £45,000 (a figure in today's economy approximating £7.7 million).

The next three decades saw substantial changes to the building both inside and out as fashions changed. In 1842, Decimus Burton was employed as architect to the club and instigated a complete redecoration and some structural alterations.

Burton was the designer of the Athenaeum which stands opposite 116 across Waterloo Place. The similarities between the two buildings are obvious and owe much to Burton's alterations. They include a large external cornice with balustrade, the frieze on the northern façade, and the fluting of the Corinthian columns on the upper portico.

Perhaps most imposingly, Burton also added the 19 cast iron flambeaux, or lanterns, around the building which were lit for ceremonial occasions, state visits and for remembrance of significant battles in British military and naval history. The flambeaux are still fully operational and can be lit for evening functions in the building.

The United Service Club occupied 116 for most of the next century and during its tenancy expanded into the adjacent buildings to provide overnight accommodation for members. These bedrooms now form the Business Centre meeting facilities on the third and fourth floors.

The Nash

Named in honour of the architect John Nash, who designed 116 Pall Mall in the 1820s, The Nash is one of London's most beautiful event rooms and our most popular choice for larger gatherings.

Luxurious in style and steeped in grandeur, this 3,000 sq ft space comfortably welcomes 350 standing guests and 250 dining on round tables. It can also be arranged with sets and stages to suit any presentation or performance.

This spectacular space also links to the Waterloo Room and both rooms are often hired together to allow for a separate space for a drinks reception or networking. The Nash adjoins a beautiful balcony overlooking the gardens below which can also be booked, providing a space for guests to get some fresh air and enjoy the views.

The Waterloo and St. James 1 & 2

This stunning double aspect room overlooks the iconic Pall Mall and Waterloo Place and is one of our most popular rooms.

This elegant double-aspect room is one of our most popular spaces. Flooded with natural light and period charm, it seats 120 theatre-style or 160 for a drinks reception.

Often hired alongside St James 1 & 2, The Waterloo works perfectly as a main event space, with extra room for reception drinks, refreshment stations or breakout spaces.

Ideal as a standalone conference room with stage and sets, or as a breakout and networking space, it also connects to the Nash Room - perfect for hosting separate receptions. As night falls, the Georgian architecture beyond the floor-to-ceiling windows creates a stunning backdrop.

The rooms can be used separately or combined for flexibility, and they can also be hired alongside other main function rooms around our balcony for larger events and exhibitions.
